- The U.S. Customs and Border Protection said a database used as a part of the agency's facial-recognition program had been accessed in a data breach through one of its subcontractors' networks. It's unclear how many images were compromised and how many people have been affected. (TechCrunch)
- President Donald Trump called into question the size and power of major American technology companies, saying that "something's going on." Trump suggested that the United States could benefit from the money collected in lawsuits against big tech companies, citing the regulatory probes in the European Union, though he noted Attorney General William Barr will "look at them differently" than European regulators. (CNBC)

- When searching for the Mueller report on Google, some people were shown an information box that classified the document into Russian interference and Trump's conduct in the 2016 election as "fiction." It is unclear why the report received such a classification, how long the label was there and how many people saw the results, but Google said the search result was an error and corrected the box by the early afternoon.
